Acquisition Information

Provenance: The majority of the material was compiled and assembled principally by Dr. Richard Alden Howard (1917-2003) during the course of the legal controversy. Howard began his Harvard career working under I.W. Bailey in 1938 and entered Harvard as a graduate student in Botany the following year. He earned his A.M. in 1940 and his doctorate in 1942 and was a Junior Fellow during 1946-1947 then joined the Biology Department as an Assistant Professor and Arboretum staff member until 1953. In 1954 he was appointed Arnold Professor and Director of the Arnold Arboretum and would lead the institution until 1978.

Historical Note

The collection contains records of the legal dispute between The Association for the Arnold Arboretum, Inc. and the President and Fellows of Harvard College that became widely known as "The Arnold Arboretum Controversy." The records reflect almost twenty years of debate about the legality and wisdom of removing resources, principally herbarium specimens, library materials, and part of the institution's endowment from the Arboretum's original location in the Jamaica Plain neighborhood of Boston, Massachusetts to a proposed building under the aegis of a newly created Botany Department on the Harvard campus in Cambridge. After a protracted legal battle the outcome was finally adjudicated by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in 1966.

The most active years of the controversy, 1949-1958, produced numerous published and unpublished documents including articles, brochures, correspondence, reports and pamphlets that contained detailed, cogent arguments from both parties. The documents were directed to the Harvard community, other botanical and horticultural institutions and associations, and the general public. Media coverage included Harvard publications such as The Harvard Crimson, Harvard Alumni Bulletin, and Harvard University President's Report. Coverage in major newspapers included The New York Times, The Boston Globe, The Boston Herald, and The Christian Science Monitor. Articles also appeared in horticultural and scientific journals such as Science, Horticulture, and The Bulletin of the American Association of Botanical Gardens and Arboreta.

The origins of the controversy began in 1945, with the issuance of a report entitled, Botany and Its Applications at Harvard, by Harvard Professor of Plant Anatomy and Arnold Arboretum staff member Irving Widmer Bailey (1884-1967). More commonly known as the "Bailey Report" or the "Bailey Plan," it proposed a reorganization of the botanical agencies at Harvard and sought to eliminate the duplication of effort and waste of financial resources by creating two broad budgetary and administrative areas. The area of General Morphology would address the herbaria and libraries of the Botanical Museum, Gray Herbarium, Farlow Library and Cryptogamic Herbarium, in Cambridge and the Arnold Arboretum in Jamaica Plain. The area of Experimental and Applied Botany was to include the Arnold Arboretum, Atkins Gardens and Research Laboratories in Cuba (now the Cienfuegos Botanical Garden), Bussey Institution (During the mid-1960s the Bussey Institution and the Botanic Garden associated with the Gray Herbarium, a seven acre site on Linnean and Garden Streets, Cambridge (now the location of the Harvard Botanic Garden Apartments and the Herbarium building, Kittredge Hall now houses Harvard University Press), duplicate books and library resources were to be sold and proceeds applied to funds for a new botanical building. The Harvard Corporation approved the Bailey Plan in the winter of 1946, and proceeded with a plan to raise one million dollars for a central botanical building.

land was taken by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by right of eminent domain and funds of the Bussey Institution endowment were committed by the Corporation to establish a new Professorship, the Bussey Professor of Biology, in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences), Harvard Forest in Petersham, Massachusetts, Maria Moors Cabot Foundation for Botanical Research (established 1937, ceased 1987 see Torrey, John G., History of the Maria Moors Cabot Foundation for Botanical Research of Harvard University 1937-1987),

Oakes Ames

In 1949 dissent arose. Professor Oakes Ames (1874-1950) former supervisor of the Arboretum (1927-1935) and Chairman of the Division of Biology (1926-1935), who had originally accepted the Bailey Plan, now raised questions about its legality. The Harvard Overseers Committee to Visit the Arnold Arboretum charged that the transfer of resources from Jamaica Plain violated the terms of the James Arnold Trust that endowed the Arboretum from its inception. These concerns were addressed by the Overseers Coordinating Committee on Biological Sciences chaired by Walter D. Edmonds (1903-1998), a member of Harvard's Board of Overseers from 1944 to 1950. A legal opinion was requested, and Alfred Lowell delivered a report upholding the Plan. Members of the Visiting Committee retained attorney J. W. Farley, whose report rejected the Plan as a "breach of trust." Grenville Clark (1882-1967), who had just resigned from the Harvard Corporation, called in a third lawyer, Robert Dodge, whose report concurred with Farley's. The President and Fellows of Harvard requested a fourth report. Oscar Shaw of Ropes & Gray wrote an endorsement, though with reservations about some details. Action under the Plan was suspended. In late 1952, the Overseers Coordinating Committee, now chaired by Laird Bell (1883-1965), recommended dropping the Bailey Plan regarding the Arnold Arboretum, but still favoring moving library and herbarium materials to the new Cambridge building. The Corporation approved the recommendation in January 1953.

Opponents were not mollified by the concessions made. In 1953, The Association for the Arnold Arboretum, Inc., an independent group of prominent citizens and scholars, many with ties to both Harvard and the Arnold Arboretum, formed with the purpose of testing the legality of the relocation of Arboretum resources. The Association asked the Massachusetts Attorney General, who alone had legal standing to sue a charitable trust, to bring suit against Harvard. When Attorney General George Fingold declined, the Association brought suit in John S. Ames et al. v. Attorney General to compel him to rehear their application.

Cambridge, Massachusetts 1954

In February of 1955, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court refused to compel the attorney general to enter a test suit over the legality of the move. Most books and herbaria specimens were transferred to the new building constructed in Cambridge in 1954, later named the Harvard University Herbaria. Erected between, and connected to, the Farlow Library and Herbarium and the Museum of Comparative Zoology, at completion the building housed the Gray herbarium and library, a major portion of the Arboretum's herbarium, library, and its wood collection in its entirety, The Oakes Ames Orchid Herbarium and library, and the Palaeobotanical Collections of the Botanical Museum. Reed C.

Rollins (1911-1998), the Asa Gray Professor of Systematic Botany Emeritus and director of the Gray Herbarium from 1948 to 1978 describes the building's planning and construction in "The Harvard University Herbarium" Taxon 4 (2) 1955.

The Association for the Arnold Arboretum, Inc. convinced the new Attorney General, Edward J. McCormack, Jr. to allow members of the Association to sue Harvard in his name and the suit was filed in 1958. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled in 1966 to uphold the removal of most books and herbarium specimens from the Arnold Arboretum Hunnewell Administration building in Jamaica Plain to the Harvard University Herbaria building in Cambridge by a 3-2 vote.

Arrangement

The collection is arranged in six series spanning 10 boxes. With few exceptions, the material was deposited in the archives in two separate transfers: the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Documents were received when the archive was established in 1984; the remaining material was also received in 1984 when transferred from Richard Howard departmental files. The files were merged, with Series 1-5 preceding series 6, with the internal arrangement of each series arranged in the order received when transferred.

Scope and Content

The collection contains correspondence, published and unpublished documents including articles, brochures, reprints, reports, pamphlets, photographs, and newspaper clippings as well as Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Documents.

The records are arranged into the following six series:

- Series I: The Bailey Report
- Series II: Arnold Arboretum Visiting Committee
- Series III: The Association for the Arnold Arboretum, Inc.
- Series IV: Opposition to the Bailey Plan

- Series V: Journal Articles and Newspaper Clippings
Series VI: Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Documents
Series VII: Photographs

AND THEIR ADAPTATION TO FUTURE ENDEAVOR

February 1946

A SIMPLE three-paragraph vote by the Harvard Corporation last month started machinery which will have far-reaching effect on Harvard's botanical empire—a domain stretching from Pisgah Forest in Winchester, N. H., to the tropical garden of the Atkins Institution in Soledad, Cuba.

Voted that this board approves in principle the reorganization of Botany contained in the revised edition . . . of Professor Irving W. Bailey's report of June 1945 . . . and that the Provost be authorized to proceed with the organization.

Voted that this board undertake to raise up to one million dollars for a central botanical building.

Voted that the Director of the University Library be authorized, with the cooperation of the Provost, to proceed with the liquidation of duplicate botanical books; and that the treasurer be authorized, with the cooperation of the Provost, to take such steps as he deems necessary to sell any surplus botanical real estate, the proceeds of any such sales to be part of the one million dollars to be raised by this board for a central botanical building.

For the botanical studies this vote by the Corporation is as historically important as the adoption of the House Plan was to the College. It means a reorientation and realignment of botanical activity at the University, the di-of the interests of important members of the botanical staff "without reference to a sound and broadly conceived program for the development of botany as a whole."

Paul H. Buck, Ph.D. '35, Provost of the University, assigned to Irving Widmer Bailey, '07, M.F. '09, Professor of Plant Anatomy, the arduous task of times mutually antagonistic and financially competitive, carried on their activities without the direction of central policy. The President of the University dealt directly with individuals and served largely as a referee in dealing with their conflicting demands and divergent viewpoints.

These nine independent provinces of Harvard's botanical realm were:

The Botanic Garden. Established in 1807 under the auspices of the Trustees of the Massachusetts Professorship of Natural History (William D. Peck, A.B. 1782, was the first incumbent). Actively supported by the Massachusetts Society for Promoting Agriculture, it became the property of the College in 1831 and an important early center for the demonstration of living plants and the teaching of botany. The Garden declined in significance after the establishment of the Arnold Arboretum and the collections of the Botanical Museum. Its greenhouses were dismantled in 1936 and it ceased to be significantly functional. The Botanic Garden was always inadequately endowed.

Gray Herbarium. Asa Gray, A.M. Hon. 1831, LL.D. '75, provided the nucleus for this collection in 1864 with his Series VII: Photographs.

Folder

1. Consists of a collection of 23 (1-16 numbered) images of the Harvard University Herbarium building all, with the possible exception of nos. 14-16, presumably taken by Walter R. Fleischer, Harvard University News Office. Eight of these images (noted by *) were published with similar captions in Rollins, Reed C. "The Harvard University Herbarium" Taxon 4 (2) March, 1955. Plate I, in the Reed article attributed to Walter R. Fleischer is not in this collection. Legends for nos. 1-16 typed on onionskin overlay and attached to verso of image. All are 8x10 b&w prints, with the exception of nos. 14, 15, and 16 which are 5x7 b&w prints.

- 1. "A modern herbarium building. The building is air-conditioned and air-filtered to reduce dust. The temperature and humidity are carefully controlled to preserve both specimens and books."
- 2. "Interior of herbarium, showing steel herbarium cases and work area at far end of corridor. The large steel cases contain 26 compartments. Depending on the thickness of the plant specimens, each compartment may contain from 50 to 250 specimens."
- 3. "Lobby of the Harvard University Herbarium."
- 4. "The reference room of the library. Doors along the left wall open into the library staff offices. Map cases and indices for taxonomic work are of steel. General reference works are on the shelves of this reading room." *
- 5. "Students attending a laboratory. The small drawers against the far wall contain wood sample." *
- 6. "Work area in the herbarium." *
- 7. "View of the stacks, Harvard University Herbarium library (comprised of the library of the Arnold Arboretum [sic Gray Herbarium?] and the scientific library of the Arnold Arboretum. The horticultural library of the Arnold Arboretum is housed in Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts). Folio volumes are stored in a flat position. periodicals (sic) are on the left of the aisle." *
- 8. "Here the herbarium specimens are sorted before being filed in the herbarium cases." *
- 9, 10. "An office in the Harvard University herbarium." [2 images, each of a different office? One showing sink and desk counter* the other showing man sitting at free-standing desk]
- 11. "Books on the counters are the Index Kewensis. This index is a composite of all the volumes of Index Kewensis which has been compiled, leaving room on the pages for new entries as they are published. The photographs on the far wall are: [blank]" *
- 12. "The Oakes Ames Orchid Herbarium, located in the Harvard University Herbarium." *
- 13. "Lecture room in the Harvard University Herbarium."
- 14, 15. Modern herbarium work requires ready access to specimens, books and microscopes. [Please note these two images were taken in the herbarium of the Arnold Arboretum in Jamaica Plain and depict Mrs. Heman Howard (Elsie) who worked as a herbarium specimen mounter." [2 images, slightly different]
- 16. "A modern herbarium specimen is mounted on heavy linen paper. Strips of cloth tape or stitches taken with linen thread may supplement the adhesion of glue or plastic. The Label in the lower left-hand corner supplies information on the specimen and its collection. A packet may contain additional fragments of the plant or microscopic dissections already made. The wood sample attached to the sheet is unusual."
- Unnumbered. "Construction of the Harvard Herbaria Building 1954" handwritten on verso and stamped " Photo by Walter R. Fleischer, Harvard University News Office, Cambridge 38, Mass."
- Unnumbered. "Lobby of Harvard U. Herbaria" handwritten on verso shows two Harvard chairs in lobby.
- Four unnumbered images of herbarium cases all without identification. Two (A, B) are of the same view of herbarium cases, corridor and outer wall workspace under windows, (B) has two people at the workspace (C) is a view of facing herbarium cases and the corridor in between, and (D) shows full cases with open doors and half cases with closed doors with Index

Kewensis volumes on the half cases. (All four of these prints have a corresponding negative in a separate folder)

2. Four more contemporary images of the Harvard University Herbaria.
 - Two are of herbarium staff: Jo UMBER, Jackie Smith, Eric Lee and Ray UMBER sorting specimens in the herbarium workroom. n.d.
 - One is of the front of the building pre-addition ca1970s
 - One is of the front of the building post-addition ca1980s
